Dynasty

Ryan Meeboer

Dynasty is a bold and exciting symphonic march. Contrasting themes, powerful low brass lines and driving percussion keep the energy up throughout this piece. Lightly articulated passages contrast the big, brassy sound making this fun to play and to listen to.

The piece opens with an attention grabbing introduction that stays strong right through until measure 17, where the piece begins to transition into its first major section at measure 21. The main melodic material takes place in a call and response fashion between various instruments. As both parts are equally important, they should be played well balanced, with held notes decreasing in volume to allow the instruments with more motion the opportunity to shine.

Also throughout this section, be sure the accompaniment can keep the tempo consistent, as the alternating notes between the bass instruments and the trombone/tenor saxophone can sometimes be tricky to keep steady and even.

New material is introduced at measure 37, which serves the dual purpose of transitional material back to the beginning of the piece, or into the trio section. With the flute/oboe/alto sax playing the melody, all other remaining instruments play strong, accompanying chords. Be sure these chords do not overpower the softer melodic instruments through this section.

The trio section begins at measure 63, with a similar, lighter style of the main section of the piece. The melody, played by alto saxes is simple and repetitive, making it easy for performers to focus on the finer details of the music (such as articulations and dynamics). At the counter melody enters at measure 79, be sure the main melody is not completely dominated by this new material.

Transitional material back to the beginning of the piece enters at measure 95. This section is meant to bring back the original, strong feeling of the piece, so it is meant to be exciting and bold. However, be sure the performers do not lose control of their tone.

The piece ends by bringing back the introduction. As mentioned before, be sure the piece closes with lots of energy, but good quality of tone is used throughout the final measures of the piece.
